

Particle Identification

A very common arrangement for the identification of charged particles uses a thin ΔE detector measuring the energy loss followed by a thick detector that stops the particle and measures a total energy E . A typical plot of ΔE versus E is shown here. The well distinct tracks belong to particles of different charge and events belonging to a special charge state can be selected by using a curved ROI and setting a condition on it.

